Sonny's Cozy Quokka Bedtime Tales

Sunny and the Tawny Frogmouth

Deep in the quiet evening bush, Sunny walked beneath the tall gum trees.
Everything was hushed and still.

She looked up at a branch. Was it a broken branch... or something else?

Two big golden eyes slowly opened. It was a tawny frogmouth!

His feathers were mottled grey and brown, exactly like the old tree bark.

“I didn't see you at all,” said Sunny. “That's the idea,” he blinked.

He sat so very still, he looked just like part of the tree.

A wide soft beak, feathers like old bark,
and eyes as gold as the moon.

“At night I sit, and watch, and wait, and listen,” he said softly.

He tipped his head right back, thin as a twig against the stars.

The bush was hushed and calm. Only the soft wind whispered by.

A little moth fluttered past. The frogmouth watched, calm and patient.

“Being still,” he said, “is a kind of quiet magic.”

So Sunny tried to sit very still too, quiet as the frogmouth.

Together they watched the stars come softly out, one by one.

Fireflies drifted by, and the moon rose silver over the gums.

The frogmouth gave a low, soft, purring
call. Oom... oom... oom.

The gentle stillness made Sunny's eyes grow heavy and slow.

“Goodnight,” whispered Sunny. The frogmouth blinked his golden eyes.

Softly, softly, Sunny padded home through the cool night grass.

She curled up warm, and slept, and dreamed of golden eyes and quiet branches.

The End.
Sweet dreams, little one. Goodnight.

Deep in the hushed evening bush, Sunny the little quokka meets a tawny frogmouth sitting so still he looks just like a branch. He shows her the quiet magic of being still and watching the night. A calm, cosy bedtime tale for winding down and drifting off to sleep. Perfect for little ones ages 1-5.
