Sonny's Cozy Quokka Bedtime Tales

Sunny and the Flying Fox

The day grew soft and the light grew low.
Sunny the quokka was not sleepy — not quite yet.

The sky turned the colour of ripe, sweet plums. And something began to move against it.

Flying foxes, sailing out from the old fig tree. One. Then three. Then many.

Their wings were wide and dark, moving through the air without a single sound.

No flap, no flutter — just a long, smooth, swooping glide. Sunny stood very still and watched.

They were so large, and so very quiet. She had not known something so big could move so softly.

One flew low — close enough to see the warm dark fur and its little fox-like face.

Neat little ears. Bright, kind eyes. A soft pointed nose.

It reached a pale moonlit blossom and drank, so gently, from the flower.

Then up it lifted, away again, back into the deep and darkening sky.

The others followed their own quiet paths
— long curved arcs, each one different.

One carried a little one, tucked close and safe, clinging softly to her fur.

The whole wide sky was soft with wings, all sailing gently home.

Down in the grass, the fireflies woke and blinked their tiny golden lights.

The moon climbed higher, pale and round,
and hushed the meadow soft and still.

And Sunny gave a small, slow yawn. The watching had made her sleepy at last.

The flying foxes drifted home, to fold their wings and rest.

So Sunny turned for home, through the cool and quiet grass.

She curled into the softest nest of leaves,
warm and safe and snug.

Her eyes fell closed. Above her, the soft wings sailed on through her dreams.

The End.
Sweet dreams, little one. Goodnight.

As the sky turns the colour of ripe plums, little Sunny the quokka watches the flying foxes lift from the old fig tree and glide, soft and silent, across the evening. A calm, gentle bedtime tale for winding down and drifting off to sleep. Perfect for little ones ages 1-5.
